14. Good Practice in the Implementation of the World Heritage Convention

14.1 - Example of good practice in World Heritage protection, identification, conservation or management at the State Party level.

With the aim of improving the conservation conditions of the site and achieving adequate stabilization, a large-scale project was carried out to replace the protection roofs of the site, a project carried out with the support of international cooperation (Government of France) and counterpart of the Government of El Salvador; this project has been complemented by general improvements to the site such as the museum rehabilitation and other support areas; in this phase, the project generated synergies with other government institutions in specific support such as the improvement of the conditions of the access roads. First phase consisted of archaeological research to determine the spaces where it was feasible to place the columns of the new roofs, this phase contributed not only to the purposes initially proposed, but also contributed to the determination of the location of other archaeological buildings that were still under the layers of volcanic ash of the site. These findings also influenced the feedback of the constructive proposal, modifying the constructive scope of the design, expanding the roofs and modifying the proposed route for the visitation of the site. For the construction phase and to reduce the risk implicit in the construction of the new roofs, the archaeological structures were protected with metal structures during the process of building the new roofs and dismantling the existing roofs. Finally, and given the amplitude generated by the new roofs, a new route was established for visitors in a completely inclusive design, with new trails duly equipped and marked with the technical information of each of the archaeological structures.
